*«Mission impossible»?
A visa liberalization view from within the EU*

With the Action Plan on Visa Liberalization, traveling to the European Union without visas seems closer than ever for Ukrainians. But the set of reforms Ukraine needs to implement to achieve this visa-free regime is very demanding. The key question is whether it will be enough.

Pension and Land Reforms in Ukraine:

Purpose, problems, the cost of non-doing, stakeholder positions, civil society impact, and recommendations

Ukraine has a good opportunity to turn land reform from an unpopular move to one that has strong support among voters. On one hand, there is considerable dissatisfaction across the board among Ukrainians about the issue of land, as most rural dwellers own land without being able to properly dispose of their property. On the other, the lack of a land market means the country has no real means of improving the productivity of the farm sector and increasing the level of investment in agriculture.

Ukraine's pension system is currently ineffective because it does not match today's demographic, social, economic and political realities. Firstly, the pensionable age in Ukraine remains unchanged since 1928. In the intervening 80 plus years, life expectancy has gone from 45 to 69 years. On one hand, there is extreme dissatisfaction among ordinary Ukrainians with the way the current system works, as most retirees get a miserable basic pension. On the other hand, pensioners can continue to work and get a salary while getting a full pension, which the state covers at the expense of the working population. Eliminating this distortion along with introducing material incentives to postpone taking a pension benefit could reduce much of the negative social impact of raising the basic pensionable age.
