ICPS analysts prepared White Paper on Ukraine's Energy

In order to carry out its commitments, Ukraine should take advantage of successful emissions reductions experiences among European countries over the last 20 years, especially Germany and Poland. Otherwise, the country will either be forced to import its electricity and fuels and reduce its own output, or it will have to reject Directive 2001/80/EC altogether. The second step will put a brake on European integration in the electricity market and lead to the further deterioration of Ukraine's own environment.

Black Sea Region Cooperation Threats and Opportunities: What they mean for Ukraine

In this issue of European Focus, ICPS analysts consider the threats to and opportunities for international cooperation in the Black Sea region that emerged during a study of subregional integration in the European Union's four sea basins: the Baltic, Mediterranean, Caspian and Black Seas. Our analysis touches on four main themes: the Four Freedoms, security and political issues, energy and transport, plus environmental and marine policy.

Raymond Struyk's book "Managing Think Tanks" is translated into Russian for the first time

Think-tanks do original research, they run educational programs, and they act as an instrument of public oversight. To that extent, they also influence the goals and values of their society.

This book is a practical guide to managing, growing and operating a think-tank. It will also be useful to a variety of funds and organizations that cooperate with think-tanks.
